Because critical care is so specialized, it's a good idea for nurses to earn certification in the field. One reason why it's important to earn certification is that it is usually required by the employer for nurses who provide direct patient care. However, it also demonstrates a high level of skill and competency for not only nurses, but APRNs, nurse managers, and clinical nurse specialists. The American Association of Critical Care Nurses has many options for nurses. The organization offers certification for adult, neonatal, and pediatric critical care, and also offers certification for those who do not perform direct patient care.
