Introduction There exists a fundamental dilemma within education policy and theory. The dilemma, as revealed by Warnock et al. (2010) is about how the equal right of every child to education can be legislated, whilst recognising, appreciating and addressing the individual differences amongst them. This essay aims to explore the various facets of this dilemma by critically discussing the differences between 'special education' and 'inclusive education'. Inclusive education, according to Villa and Thousand (2005) embraces each and every student, irrespective of their abilities, forming one whole school community. An Introduction to Understanding.
