Teaching the Days of the Week/Calendar Numbers/Months. Prekindergarten Calendar Time Songs and Activities. Related Links. Teachers often plan preschool calendar activities to take place at the beginning of the school day, when children are sitting in a group or circle. [caption id="attachment_130942" align="center" width="640"] Start with the days of the week[/caption] When setting up for pre-K calendar time, use a large-size template of blank squares (seven rows across, five. In preparation for teaching the days of the week, attach all seven word pictures to the calendar in the appropriate order (Sunday through Saturday). During pre-K calendar time on a Monday, point to the corresponding words and say, "Today is Monday. Yesterday was Sunday. Lesson planning can be complex, with lots of different sections of the lesson to think about. Being properly prepared for any eventuality in your lesson starts with good planning. By using sections, like in the lesson plan example below, you can cover all of your bases. When lesson planning, consider the following: Lesson objectives. Lesson materials. Lesson discussion questions. Activity options for multiple group sizes. Lesson notes or feedback. There is no point planning your week if you forget what you planned for in the middle of the week. Thus, scheduling everything into your calendar and sync it across all devices is extremely crucial. If other people have access to your work calendar, just use your private calendar for additional time blocks like workouts and family time and sync them all in one single view. If I know how my week will look like by the time I am in the office on Monday morning, I am not only more focused on actually getting my work done but also a lot less stressed. Furthermore, by pro-actively blocking time in my calendar for the things that are important in my life and work, I am a lot less likely to say "YES" to random lunch invites, projects or after-work activities that are not aligned with my priorities.
