Radar Contacts off Da Nang

Like green varmints, skunks creep across the scope
Nosing their way between the darkened waves,
Shunting as they try to remain unseen.
Hull down black on a moonless, starless night,
They scurry over crests to sniff the trough
And then course down their meandering ways.
Russian trawlers stalking prey, sampans, junks?
The sweeps trace only unknown blips,
While hunters, standing quiet on the bridge,
Remain alert, watching, lest they be sprayed.

A graduate of the United States Naval Academy, Phillip Parotti now teaches English at Sam Houston State. He is the author of two collections of short fiction about the Trojan War: The Greek Generals Talk and The Trojan Generals Talk. He is also the author of the novel Fires in the Sky.

A radar data processing system was also put into operation at a flight management center in Da Nang the same day, the government portal said in a statement. The secondary surveillance system on Son Tra, an island off Da Nang, covers a radius of 450km, while the primary radar system can detect objects at a range of 150 km. The secondary system detects and measures the position of an aircraft, such as range and bearing, and requests additional information from the aircraft itself such as its identity and altitude. Meanwhile, the primary system only measures the range and bearing of targets by detecting reflected radio signals. Only Da Nang does. Here are 4 reasons this under-rated destination needs to be on your radar. ADVERTISING. Da Nang's beaches were where the first American combat troops arrived in 1965. Today, on its 30+ miles of beaches along the South China Sea you'll find locals playing beach volleyball, fishermen setting out and returning in their traditional basket boats and travelers sunbathing or taking surfing lessons. Here, you won't be harassed by vendors selling counterfeit designer sunglasses or bags, either. At Da Nang's most popular beach, My Khe, the sand isn't white and the water isn't turquoise. Still, it's much cleaner than most city beaches including those found in Bali and Phuket. Legacy Software. Contact us. Login. Upgrade Now. Utc 21:20. Dad / vvdn. Da Nang International Airport.
