R.K. Narayan’s The Guide and Literary History¹

THE CRITICAL RECEPTION OF R.K. NARAYAN’S fourteen novels over a period of more than half a century has established him as the most popular of the three founding fathers of the modern Indian novel in English. Nearly 900 publications — monographs and essay collections, contributions to learned journals and magazines, reviews of single works in diverse media, and filmed versions of at least two works — exceed by far the attention paid to Mulk Raj Anand, or Raja Rao’s achievement. They testify, besides, to the sustained interest in Narayan’s narrative oeuvre that ranges from Swami and Friends (1935) to The World of Nagaraj (1989). An overview will give an idea of the number of critical responses during the periods 1935-1970, the 1970s, the 1980s, and 1990-2004. Besides, it will permit a close look at The Guide (1958), Narayan’s most popular novel. Its literary innovative features will show that this story, though embedded in the intermediate period between the late colonial and the early independence years in India, is a forerunner of the post-1980s Indian novel in English.

Literary criticism understood as textual analysis and evaluation is intimately intertwined with parameters of quality and much less with those of quantity. Still, statistical figures arrived at by looking at the overall critical reception of a writer’s oeuvre, the attention paid to his early and/or mature works and the ranking of individual texts offer insight into his achievement and certainly intellectual pleasure to the mathematically-minded observer. To start with, I would like to pick up on this idea and investigate the critical reception of R.K. Narayan's work from this angle, and in particular the response to The Guide (1958). Thereafter I shall relate my findings to a selection of critical-analytical insights presented by his literary critics. What do figures collected and assembled from a period of six decades (1934-2004), tell us, and where do they take us with regard to a qualitative assessment of the writer's overall achievement, and of his The Guide?

My own comprehensive Narayan bibliography² (2005) contains 858 publications, including 134 reviews, written by approximately 600 authors and thirty anonymous reviewers. 180 of the 600 critics, or three of ten, are foreigners: a considerable percentage, which documents Narayan's international reputation. Concomitantly, I noticed that Narayan criticism proper set in only twenty-five years after the publication of his first novel, Swami and Friends (1935), and after nine of his fourteen works had already been available, first from well-known English publishers, and then from an Indian publishing house, the author's own Indian Thought Publications in Mysore. With the appearance of The Guide however, critics appear to have woken up suddenly, and as their increasing attention from the 1960s onward testifies, they have never since lost sight of the novelist's work. This, his eighth novel, has remained the author's most popular work. In 1961, it was honoured by the Sahitya Akademi in New Delhi, as the first Indian novel in English to win the Akademi's national award. Statistically speaking, it has been scrutinised, analysed, and written about more often than any other Narayan novel, which virtually invites us to establish a connection between quantitative and qualitative criteria of assessment. Eighty-four essays and books on The Guide by far outnumber the thirty critical responses to The Man-Eater of Malgudi (1961), the novel that comes next in popularity — not to mention the two essays on Mr. Sampath (1949), for many critics the author's least convincing novel. Very much the same can be said about reviews: twenty-five on The Guide, or nearly double the number than on The Financial Expert (1952), a novel obviously very much appreciated by American reviewers. Furthermore, we must not overlook the numerous analyses of The Guide contained in general essays on Narayan's oeuvre, or in comparative studies that relate his work to other Indian or to international novelists writing in English. Naturally, these figures must be related to the number of years a book has been on the market. Even so, The Guide takes an impressive lead, with a factor of 2.43 that arises from the number of critical essays and books divided by the number of years the novel has been in print. Here The Bachelor of Arts (1937) with a factor of 0.12 makes up the 14th and last position.

Let us now have a look at characteristic features of Narayan's writing during the four periods into which I have subdivided the reception process, starting with the years 1935 to 1970, and followed by the 1970s, the 1980s and the 1990s and after. About ninety more or less brief publications, complemented by about 100 reviews appeared during the initial period. Basically, the essays attempt to present us with an overall-view and a general evaluation of Narayan's works, not unexpectedly summarising and commenting upon their plots and characters, their themes and narrative modes and the author's use of English. Already now, references to The Guide figure prominently, with the remarkable number of twenty-one reviews published in 1958, the same year as the book. Altogether in a positive vein — which was an exception among Indian critics of the time when commenting upon their compatriots' writing in English — the writer's story-telling talent is as much lauded as his gentle humour and simple language, his sharp focus on the Indian middle-class, and his refraining from commenting upon his stories and from preaching. Characteristics, as William Walsh remarked, that defined his "Indian sensibility"³, and caused C.D. Narasimhaiah to praise his writing as "truly Indian",⁴ and K.R. Srinivasa Iyengar to speak of the author's "thoughts and feelings, the stirrings of the soul ... all of the soil of India, recognizably autochthonous."⁵

Overall, textual analysis or close reading is the preferred method of interpretation, which reflects both, a critical awareness of the need to introduce Narayan to his new readers, and the predominant methodology of the time, the school of New Criticism. Still, apart from focusing on the text qua text, we also come across comparative studies meant to explore common themes and narrative structures, and to contextualise Narayan's writing from a literary historical, a psychological or an ideological angle. Iyengar, for example, takes his cue from the town of Malgudi, the novels' exceptional setting, and suggests, "that Malgudi is the real 'hero' of the eleven [sic! nine] novels and many short stories."⁶ The novels' characters, on the other hand, “seem to achieve some sort of transmigration from body to body and name to name.” (ibid.) “Narayan,” he argues, “seems to see the world as a mere balance of forces,” and focuses on “the miracle of transcendence and the renewal of life, love, beauty, peace.”⁷

As it would prove over the next four decades, Iyengar’s judgement was almost taken as the final word on Narayan and was hardly ever questioned seriously, not the least, I believe, because it appeared so strikingly true to Indian critics on the one hand, while an international critical discourse on the Indian novel in English was to develop only gradually, with the reception of Narayan’s work abroad and ‘non-Indian’ critical approaches to a comparatively ‘new’ genre of the novel. For example, Walsh, Narayan’s first serious British critic, broadens Iyengar’s character analyses by placing these figures against their social and cultural background, and he also invites our attention to the fact that non-Indian readers will not immediately understand the novels’ cultural references: a sine qua non, as a look back at the critical misjudgement of the East German Walter Ruben’s Marxist-Orientalist approach demonstrates. Calling the portrayal of Raju, “ein untypisches kleinbürgerliches Einzelschicksal” — “a single individual’s atypical petit bourgeois fate,”⁸ betrays Ruben’s ideologically blinkered view as much as his non-knowledge of India.

Walsh, Iyengar, and Ruben — to whose names we can add James Dale (1965) and K. Venkatachari (1969) — look at Narayan’s whole oeuvre, but they also pay much attention to The Guide, while Narasimhaiah and Satyanarain Singh (1968) offer extended analyses of the novel. However, their estimate of its thematic concerns and character portrayals — Singh, for example talks about “crisis and resolution” — does not fundamentally differ from their colleagues’ conclusions.

A look at the writer’s achievement in the 1970s suggests a reversal of the previous period, a creatively most productive phase in Narayan’s career, since he published just one novel, The Painter of Signs (1976). Yet these were no barren years, because they witnessed the publication of three collections of short stories, a travelogue, an autobiographical account and the condensed prose versions of The Ramayana (1973) and The Mahabharata (1978). At the same time and luckily, the long break between The Vendor of Sweets (1967) and The Painter of Signs (1976) appears to have invited many critics to take stock and assess the novelist’s achievement up to that point; an altogether promising task, as it proved, since by now his eleven novels had become easily available, both in India and abroad. 140 critical responses, including ten reviews, demonstrate that Narayan had begun to establish himself as a writer worthwhile reflecting about and writing upon.

The 1970s experienced the publication of four books on the author and two on The Guide. Besides, we now also encounter a widening interest in Indian writing in English and concomitantly, a growing number of general studies of the Indian novel in English, quite a few of which would contain separate chapters on Narayan's works or relate them to those of others. To mention only a few and more original publications: Meena Shirwadkar's Image of Woman in the Indo-Anglian Fiction (1979) is a first step towards Indian feminist studies and pays more attention to the author's women characters than earlier critics have done, whereas Uma Parameswaran's A Study of Representative Indo-English Novelists (1976) takes existing Narayan criticism as her point of departure, thus creating an awareness of the methodology of reception aesthetics. Looking at the author's narrative talent often praised by others, she considers him a weak narrator, since in "seven out of ten novels the plot breaks midway, never quite managing to resolve the incongruence between realism and fantasy which are its main components."⁹ Only The Guide, she feels, differs because of the story's ambiguous ending with its near perfect unity of realism and fantasy. Besides, Parameswaran's earlier verdict, that Raju "speculat[es] that this risk [of death or survival] pays dividends," and that he will recover to accept a glucose-saline injection and his light will shine brighter than ever for his devotees",¹⁰ certainly strikes a new note when compared to other critics' morally-veiled judgement of the guide's sacrifice and/or redemption.

The very question of narrative mode also brought into play by Parameswaran is pursued by several of her colleagues who comment upon the comic, the parabolic, the symbolic or the mythic mode. For Keith Garebian Narayan's vision of life in its totality, a characteristic Indian attitude, is best served by a comic impulse, which is most convincingly presented parabolically and episodically. M. Sivaramkrishna (1978) foregrounds the symbolic mode and feels that in The Guide, symbolically speaking, cave and temple are structuring devices. Thus, Raju, Rosie, and Marco become equally 'guilty' as they conceive of the temple, respectively, as a tourist item, as “part of what [Rosie] regards as an ignoble past,” and as a “curio cerebrally cut off from the rest of life.”¹¹ However, Raju’s gradual insight into the true meaning of this building does not only restore ‘order’ — Iyengar’s category — but appears to redeem him. Parabolically speaking then, he mutates from sinner to saint, or as Goyal (1977) and vanden Driesen (1979) have entitled their articles, respectively, “From Picaro to Pilgrim”, and “From Rogue to Redeemer.”

As a final example of original thinking, Vijay Misra’s (1979) philosophical handling of the dialectic of maya and Indian literary texts takes recourse to the philosopher Shankara’s idea of structuring the relationship between Brahman (the Real) and the phenomenal world as “metaphysical encounters.” Misra refers to them as “meta-text I.” Discussing The Guide vis-à-vis this perception, its text proper, called “text II,” reveals itself as patterned along the tension of nartaki (Rosie), the self (Raju) and bhakti (Raju’s escape from samsara); which leads Misra to conclude that the Indian novel cannot get away from the weight of the construct, the “meta-text II.” That is to say, “Indian literary texts carry within themselves theories about Indian literature”¹²: the knowledge of perceptions articulated in Indian aesthetics helps the critic towards placing even a text in English within his own literary-philosophical tradition.

Approximately 240 critical studies, including more than half a dozen monographs and four comprehensive essay collections, written by 150 critics, of whom fifty are from outside India, appeared in the 1980s. More urgently than hitherto, such heightened attention paid to the author, whose last three novels had appeared between 1983 and 1989, makes us ask about the relationship of quantity and quality. Do we encounter criticism that more or less and necessarily repeats and summarises insights the discerning reader has already come across? Do essays in collections and journals depart, if not altogether, then at least to some degree, from well-trodden paths? And finally, do we encounter more recent methods of investigation, say Sanskrit aesthetics or feminist theory, or fresh ones like the ‘new’ trends of postmodernist or postcolonial theorising? The answer would be: usually not, but at times, yes. The narrative mode continues to attract critics, for example, U.P. Sinha who discusses the idea of a ‘mythic’ novel, which when successfully put into practice, presents “the mythic element of Indian sensibility in a creative grapple with reality.¹³ As Sinha maintains, the status of mythic can be bestowed upon Narayan's work because of the author's "mythic consciousness"¹⁴ that makes the world of Malgudi "simultaneously temporal and timeless."¹⁵ D.V.K. Raghavacharyulu returns to comedy, which he says, can "evoke pity and terror, and through them work towards an appropriate katharsis";¹⁶ brought about, for example, in The Guide. Such a reading, he says, brings to light that facet of the Indian aesthetic tradition that "stresses on [sic!] sama-drishti as the capacity to view suffering and sorrow... as but an integral part of the ontological situation."¹⁷

S.P. Ranchan and G.R. Kataria contribute to the feminist discourse by employing C.G. Jung's idea of the Feminine, which causes them to reject a traditional reading from a Hindu-philosophical angle of the male protagonist's transformation, for example in The English Teacher (1945), in favour of one "brought about by the Feminine." It is "radically different from the kind of transformation sought after by most religions through meditation or visualization."¹⁸ Similarly, Raju comes to the Feminine not through Rosie but through the "descending force of the Feminine which is symbolized in the descent of the rain in the distant hills."¹⁹ Both critics differ from Ram Dial's psychoanalytical approach, who argues that it is the interaction of Raju's anima and Rosie's animus that furthers their development towards Self: a Self eventually realized when Raju is transformed "through his interaction with the collective psyche into the living archetype of a Wise Man."²⁰ Regrettably, Ram Dial drops Rosie somewhere on the way to her realisation of Self — as does the author: a relapse from psychoanalysis into Advaita Vedanta.

Attention paid to a single Narayan novel is one of the outstanding quantitative features of the 1980s, and here every third of roughly seventy essays focuses on The Guide, with The Man-Eater of Malgudi (1961) coming second, but boasting merely a dozen critical responses. Among the more exciting readings, we come upon differing analyses of the psychological make-up of characters in The Guide. For K.M. Chandar (1984), Raju suffers from an inferiority complex, which explains his partly successful, yet eventually failing attempts at over-compensation. Escape from over-anxiety as a last resort complements the picture of such a mental disposition, with the novel's protagonist finally accepting his fate, not because of his insight, but because of his weakness brought about by fasting. Jai Dev (1987) looks at Raju's childhood, a period totally controlled by his elders, which foreshadows his need to be supported by his community — as Velan does, holding him literally up in the river. It is a view not shared by G.S. Amur (1985), to whom Raju's end symbolizes transcendence, while Viney Kirpal (1988) insists on varnashrama: Raju journeys through the four stages of life to Self-realisation. Finally, O.P. Mathur (1982) considers the ambivalent make-up of all major characters as culturally determined by their traditional world, into which the West has entered and created a "grey twilight world of contemporary life quivering hesitatingly between tradition and modernity, East and West, inextricably mixed up in the minds of individuals."²¹

Considering Narayan's advanced age and surmising that The World of Nagaraj (1989) would perhaps be his final novel, it was to be expected that criticism from the 1990s onward might turn more often towards attempting an overall assessment of his literary achievement. Indeed, the impressive number of twenty-seven book-length publications between 1990 and 2004 testifies to this development, especially when compared with the previous decade. Similarly pertinent is the observation that eighty essays deal with a single novel, which might be partly attributable to the fact that the number of 'first-time' Narayan critics had grown faster than ever before, most of them, of course, being academic newcomers who would naturally choose to focus on just one work. Indeed, of the 600 authors listed in my book, about every fourth scholar's name makes its first appearance during these years. Still, and in spite of the spate of these publications, a close look at them betrays an imbalance between quantity and quality, if the latter is to be understood as bringing about original insights and thus adding to and widening our understanding and appreciation of the writer's literary output. More often than not, old traces are being followed by young academics, many of them from university departments of English, who seem to be not always aware of existing scholarship, perhaps innocently so because of the lack of resources. Remarkable again is the supreme role The Guide plays during these years, so is the 'resurrection' of The Dark Room (1938) and Swami and Friends (1935) after their long slumber in limbo and due to feminist studies and an increased interest in children and young adult literature. The Guide though continues to set critics on the track of character analysis, with Raghavendra Narayan Singh (1994) and R. Ramachandra (1994) drawing our attention to the neglected aspect of their loneliness. For Narayan Singh, they battle their condition in a gender-specific manner: males by resorting to their amorous instincts, women by turning to artistic occupations.²² Michael Gorra (1994) and K. Meera Bai (1994) reject such simplistic notions and point to the influence of Hindu perceptions of man and woman, while contrasting views on the figure of Rosie-Nalini are offered by Balbir Singh, Lakshmi Holmstroem and Gayatri Chakravorti Spivak. Singh relates the Jungian idea of human beings' desire for immortality as a "primordial affirmation," and its realisation in the collective unconscious, to the Indian ideal of conveying "a sense of timelessness."²³ Holmstroem contextualises Rosie by foregrounding the social aspect of her 'development': a "deliberate ambiguity in [her] portraiture",²⁴ attributable to the woman's presentation from a male narrator's angle, which mirrors "the bafflement of a traditional, largely male society, in its face-to-face encounter with new notions of selfhood and particularly, of womanhood."²⁵ Spivak addresses the figure of Rosie from a postcolonial angle and calls her the "remote instrument of Raju's enforced sanctity," and "the nautch (dance) girl... a cliché of the imagining of British India",²⁶ who eventually "is not needed in the last phase of the book: the phase of ethnicity over culture. India is folk kitsch."²⁷

A further critical approach to The Guide deals with story-construction although character 'development' continues to play its part here too. For Patrick Swinden the "only change [in life and character] is in the recognition of the unchanging”,²⁸ due to parameters of Hindu philosophy playing an important role in the novel. On the surface, Raju appears to change, an impression brought about by the writer’s use of Western storytelling techniques, such as changing the point of view and time-shifts. Yet Narayan’s employment of Hindu myths and traditional narrative patterns, Swinden maintains, forces us to read Raju as a saint and a trickster, a personality not unlike a hero taken from an Indian epic, such as the Ramayana.²⁹ Chitra Sankaran too emphasises the writer’s “instinctive assimilation of his native literature”³⁰ and draws on storytelling elements of “the ancient Sanskrit genre, the katha or tale”³¹ with its insertion of different stories into a single narrative, its movement back and forth between past and present, and accordingly, its employment of different narrative tones. Likewise, characterisation is also dictated by traditional considerations:³² Raju is the “trickster sage” of Hindu mythology, acting as a link between the Gods and humans.³³ Nonetheless, to this critic The Guide is not a myth but a novel where Narayan succeeds in “making it feasible to interpret Raju’s fate in both these lights.”³⁴

A final cross-cultural reading of the book highlights hybridity as the catchword of its ‘postcolonial scenario’ in Monika Fludernik’s comparative study. Hybridity links Raju to postcolonialism in that his lack of self-confidence is a direct outflow of the dependency the colonial power had forced upon its subjects. Further, accepting his role as a sadhu, might not only “signal a kind of token nationalist and traditional revival”³⁵ but also “constitutes the major instance of hybridity in the text... in that Raju appropriates traditional signifiers for his own decidedly secular ends.”³⁶ Other phenomena of hybridity, Fludernik proposes, are Marco, the “blind” colonial usurper, who is tricked by the crafty native, and Raju’s commercialisation of Indian culture in his role as guide and impresario.

The Guide then “illustrates a pattern of postcolonial hybridity,” where the traditional wins over the modern, but “only after having been hybridized by the influence” of the Western world.³⁷

My summarising account of the critical discourse on Narayan’s novels and particularly on The Guide shows a prevalence of a particular critical approach at a given period, which reflects, or is apt to mirror, the then dominating influence of a critical school. Further, the choice of certain questions directed at a text is motivated by what critics feel to be uppermost in a writer’s mind. Applied to Narayan, it is his interrogation of the make-up and fate of his character(s) — and to tell their stories appropriately. With The Guide the large number of (differing) analyses of the story’s open ending reflects their preoccupation with Raju’s identity not only in his role as the teller of his own tale but also as the projection of the third-person narrator. In this respect and against the background of the Indian English novel written between the 1930s and 1950s The Guide holds a special position which, I would like to argue, indicates the novelist’s doubt about the concept of identity as well as about the scope and truth of realistic story telling.

Yet it was to be a younger generation of Indian writers who really opened new vistas of story-telling a few decades later. Though sharing their concern for contemporary Indian man and woman with Narayan their novels engage much less with the role of tradition in modernity than with the repercussions of modernity upon Indians in a world they increasingly conceive of in global terms; a world where India’s national borders become more and more porous as, among other factors, the spread of Indian diasporas testifies. If Raju the guide’s predicament could be read as the writer’s examination of the concept of guru,³⁸ Indian English novelists of the late 20th century predicate their character portrayals in their fictional constructions of modern man and woman quite generally on the fluidity of the term identity; a venture, incidentally, that entails experimentation in narrativization as a result of questioning the meaningfulness of the realistic mode. They are wary of the narrator’s reliability or the need to round off his or her story; they distrust the truth of a master narrative, and they have created a post-modern pastiche of modulated narrative bits and pieces that offer the reader an astounding range of thematic references and diverse variants of what happened. To mention but a few examples that deserve a more detailed analysis than can be undertaken here. In Ruchir Joshi's The Last Jet-Engine Laugh (2001) the seventy year-old narrator Paresh delves into his past and that of his family under the motto, "ki unhone kyakya, kyakya nahi kio", "what he did do and did not do" — a maxim, incidentally, that had motivated Raju to tell his life-story to his listener Velan; or Hari Kunzru's main character in The Impressionist (2002), appearing under an array of different names — Pran, Rukhsana, Pretty Bobby, Jonathan, "an eight-anna" — who takes us even further by creating a multiple identity for himself.³⁹ And to add: these characters are made to live in a fictitious world where the realistic narrative mode does not 'rule supreme', on the contrary: magic realism, fantasy writing or science fiction have made inroads as narrative strategies that underpin the post-modern constructedness of these narratives as well as they direct our attention to many writers' agnostic attitudes. Epistemologically, The Guide has not exactly 'shown the way', but behind the author's back the novel has indicated the direction into which a substantial number of Indian novels in English would move in the future. Indeed, the first sentence of a fictitious story Narayan supposedly had written down a long time ago, "The train had just arrived at Malgudi", could be complemented by Railway Raju, voice over: "and has since moved on to new destinations."

The use of solar panels has already moved from a purely domestic application for heating housing in the transport sector. They were the first to be used by car companies that produce electric vehicles that attach solar panels to the roofs of cars. In 2017, Australians followed the same path by placing solar energy batteries on a train. Such a train already runs in Byron Bay, Australia. The technology of autonomous trains has been used in many countries of the world for more than one year. But it continues to be touted as the future of railroads. The reason for this is simple: the system itself is constantly progressing in technical terms and is used on increasingly long routes, and in addition, the automation of transportation is constantly being optimized. An object falls from the car and the observer in the train notices that the car has moved on for one minute, turned back, and moved with a speed of 10 km/h and picked up the object two minutes after turning. Find (a) The velocity of the train relative to the ground and (b) The velocity of the car during its forward and reverse journeys Assume that the object comes to rest immediately after fall from the point of view of the observer on the ground. 1. See answer. $40/3$ & $20/3$ km/Hr. Step-by-step explanation: Let say velocity of the train relative to the ground = V km/Hr. An observer in a train moving with a uniform velocity finds that a car moving parallel to the train has a speed of 10 km/h in the direction of motion of the train. \Rightarrow Car Speed = $V + 10$ km/Hr. If we all move in a car, nobody moves, says Carlo Ratti, director of the Senseable City Lab at MIT in Cambridge, Massachusetts. The more ventilation there is in your chosen form of transport, the better (Credit: Reuters). It seems that the backrests between rows on the train type they looked at " a high-speed Chinese intercity train " may have provided something of a barrier. People sitting on the same row on an intercity journey may also have needed to pass each other at close quarters to visit the toilet or refreshments. (Importantly, though, the researchers couldn't rule out that transmission on rows was higher because people sitting adjacent are more likely to be family and friends, already in close contact.)
